Our world is constantly becoming bigger and more complex: the perspective is to be global, action has to be according to criteria of mobility and flexibility. The catchphrase “Europe” is often exploited, although it has so much more to offer; “Europe” is an option for the future that in addition to the political economic maxim of action is in urgent need for a cultural and social self-assurance and, without a precise analysis of its history cannot be guaranteed. In particular, the science of history is asked to overcome, both substantive and methodological limitations in order to open up horizons for an interdisciplinary and international research in and about Europe. This is where the research-oriented Master’s degree programme “European History” starts and where it therefore accentuates in his four-semester programme especially the following areas:

Specialised courses
In addition to the intensive study of the interplay of social, economic, political and cultural contexts of the history of Europe from antiquity to the present day, this area comprises mainly in-depth knowledge of methods and theories of historical research and the ability to apply that knowledge independently.

European perspectives
The study programme breaks through the national perspective view of history in two respects: On the one side a correspondingly contoured module offers promotes knowledge about European and global dimensions of historical exchange and integration processes. In addition the mandatory semester abroad offers the opportunity to explore such processes in concrete ways and other scientific cultures.

As a total the specialisation ensures with its theoretical and conceptual sharpened tools the analysis of past and present and its interrelations.

Interdisciplinary and intercultural competences
Modules on European topics, interdisciplinary projects and courses provide insights into the specifics of European historiography- and scientific cultures strengthen the capacity for international comparison and for recognizing relationships and linkages and create an awareness of interdisciplinary research methods.

Individual profiling
In addition to a confident handling of theoretical and methodological foundations of the discipline the linking of specialized scientific and practical professional perspectives is emphasized. In that way special programmes on various professional and / or research field strengthen the training of an individual profile.
